The income tax feature is coming in for the greatest attention. As yet, however, few of the details of the assessment and collection of tax have been perfected.

The first consideration has been given to revolding, as far as possible, the inquisitorial features of such a measure.
For this reason it has been practically concluded to do away with assessors and like officers, who would ferret out incomes and to place the main reliance on voluntary reports from those receiving incomes of over $4.000.

Lawyer O'Gorman then offered in evidenge the letters testamentary of the probating of Austin's will and again Col. James objected.

Joseph A. Dallon, a collector, at 74 State street, swore that July 4, 1891, he was at Manhattan Beach.

"Along about 5 o'clock in the afternoon," said Dallon, "I was walking along the promenade near the beach watching the bathers.

swimmer giving a public exhibition. I watched twenty minutes to see him come up again.

"Wednesday I saw in the papers an account of Austin's drowning. Next day I called on Austin's brother and told him what I had seen."

Col. James cross-examined Mr. Dallon at length as to the route he took to Manhattan Heach, what he paid for his ticket and as to his each and every movement during the day.

Col. James then read from an affidavit made by the witness in the Fall of 1891, in which he fixed the time of seeing the men swimming at a little past 5, and upon this point the astute lawyer attempted to get the witness to fix some specific time, but Mr. Dallon said he had no watch and could not say.

Witness said he went to the beach after hearing the concert. Col. James asked him if he did not know the concert was not concluded until 6, but received a negative answer.

It was evident from the close questioning of Col. James as to the exact time witness saw the men on the raft that it will play an important part in the allegations of the defense.
